CALL TO ACTION

A paper plate campaign is an excellent way to gather powerful, personal messages about food insecurity in your community that can be shared with elected officials.

Purchase plain paper plates without any coating.

Decide how to implement your campaign. Consider those who are visiting food pantries, receiving meals or stopping by blessing boxes. The best time to collect stories is while they're waiting in line.

Decide what questions to ask, and keep them simple. Examples include: How is the food you receive important to you and your family? Why do you come to the food pantry/blessing box? What would you like elected officials to know about your family?

Ask the person to include their first name, age and ZIP code. That's useful for using the paper plate as a letter to send to elected officials.

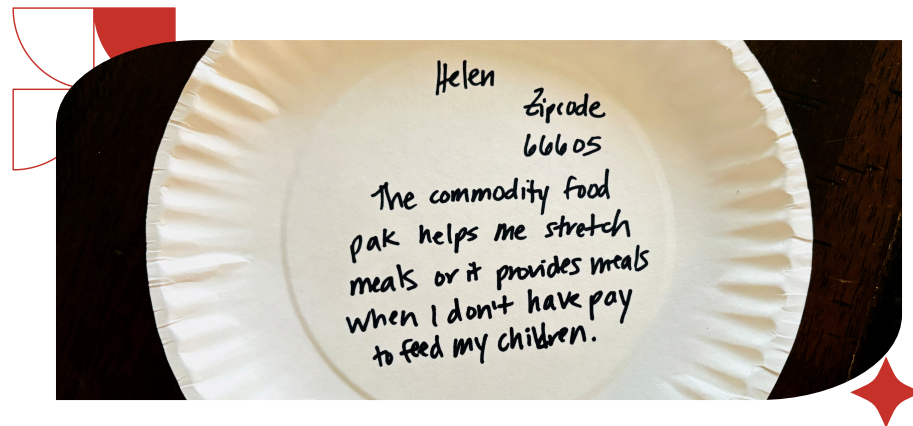

Use the plates as constituent letters and deliver them to local, state and federal elected officials.
